

35

As a general thing, psychologists are not great minds, and only a great mind should be a psychologist. And it is quite true that only the great mind can be the psychologist, only a great mind can dispense sound mental advice.

Psychology, as practiced with specialized authority, that is, as a business, is not necessarily in possession of the ^{full} knowledge of health which should be the ingredient of every learning, ~~that~~ ^{Scarcely, particular knowledge, it does possess but it is} ~~that which is taught and learned~~ ^{a knowledge which cannot be applied} may be applied with the least ill effects. In other words, no learning should consist of a one-sided knowledge. It should always be supplemented by general development of the person. Otherwise, knowledge can never be made a satisfactory possession.

Man's knowledge of himself makes his knowledge of the world incorrupt by which it becomes accourage and real comfort to him. Whereas knowledge without his self-understanding acts opposedly to his welfare and makes him perish.

P. 796

P. 797